Plasma-Microbubble Interaction for Ultrasound-Guided Drug Delivery. Ultrasound-mediated drug delivery using microbubbles is a promising noninvasive technique in local drug delivery for treatment of various diseases. In this paper, the interaction between air-filled microbubbles and blood plasma in vitro is investigated and the related acoustic parameters are determined to produce "on-demand" drug release from air-filled microbubbles. Experiments are performed in a closed chamber with a region of low acoustic impedance (glass bottle) surrounded by a region of higher acoustic impedance (water). The acoustic wave propagates in the glass bottle and thus results in the generation of two different types of sound: i) the near-field ultrasound (NFU), which is the radiated wave that propagates into the region of high acoustic impedance and ii) the far-field ultrasound (FFU), which is the radiated wave that propagates into the region of low acoustic impedance. The experiments show that the NFU gradually increases as the microbubble concentration increases and reaches the maximum value at a concentration of 0.25 M. The FFU then decreases as the concentration of microbubbles increases. The maximum FFU is realized at 0.25 M microbubbles and decreases as the concentration of microbubbles decreases. The relationship between the concentrations of microbubbles and both types of ultrasound is discussed. Moreover, the influence of microbubble concentration on both types of ultrasound is analyzed.#include #include #include
